Beyond the security paradox: ten criteria for a socially informed security policy

Introduction

Over the past twenty years, but especially since 9/11, security policies in western societies have increasingly adopted pre-emptive measures which are reliant on Surveillance-Oriented Security Technologies (SOSTs). This shift has had controversial consequences, with scholars highlighting a variety of concerns they associate with pre-emptive security and surveillance practices (Pavone and Degli Esposti, 2012, Hoijtink, 2014, De Goede, 2014, De Goede and Randalls, 2009). As new SOSTs facilitate the collection, storage, processing and combination of personal data by security agencies and commercial organizations, their impact on established civil and political rights (Friedewald et al., 2010), social sorting (Strauß and Nentwich, 2013, Lyon, 2007a), and on individual privacy (Lyon, 2002)¹ has been criticized.

With so many concerns raised by technologies over which citizens have little control, it would be reasonable to expect Public Engagement with Science (PES) studies to have scrutinised how people assess these technologies and their implementation. However, SOSTs have so far received relatively little attention (Martin and Donovan, 2014, Pavone and Degli Esposti, 2012). Inspired by an unquestioned acceptance of the trade-off between privacy and security, early studies tend instead to consider the extent to which citizens are willing to trade their privacy in exchange for greater security

¹ Many of these concerns have been recently confirmed by the scandals and abuses revealed by whistleblowers like Assange, Snowden and Manning in LANDAU, S. 2013.
